Peter Cadogan, with his servant, Terry Yeagh, aboard the schooner Colleen, is making for New Orkans to pick it p. Lomax, prior to a cruise in the iCarlibean Sea, when suddenly he is arotused from his slumbers by a cryof "Helpt." coming across the water.

CHAPTER I (Continued).

A ND in an instant, in a breath, in two bounds, Cadogan had obeyed the seanan's primal instinct and huried himself on deck, where he paused, confused and numb with sleep.

"Creagh!"

"Yes, Misther Pether?"

The man lifted himself from a recumbent position near the wheel and stared inquiringly, not a little startled by the pajamaed apparation against the light from the companionway.

As for Cadogan, he held tongue until his brain should clear. There seemed, at first glance, nothing amiss:

The Colleen rode with an ewen keel, rolling very slightly as shet's lipred down the long swale left by a sleek-barred like gentle rain upon the slack. In the clear void betwixt sea and was swinging slowly athwart ships, an overhead block whining, receptions to be noticeable even at that distance.

"A boat, Terry!" Cadogan's voice quavered with excitement. "A dory adrift, and some one in her calling for help. I knew I couldn't be missing the pajamaed apparation against the light from the companionway.

As for Cadogan he held tongue until his brain should clear. There seemed, at first glance, nothing amiss:

The Colleen rode with an ewen keel, rolling very slightly as she's slipped and was swinging slowly athwart ships, an overhead block whining, receptions.

The colleen rode with an even keel, rolling very slightly as she's slipped and the clear void betwixt sea and sky; rang and—flattened against the slipped cannow was swinging slowly athwart ships, an overhead block whining, receptions.

The sky was clear, blazing with stars to the zenith. In the east the blood-red crescent of a moon on its fou 'in quarter of the startled by the pajamaed apparation against the moonlist lane. But there was no answer.

across the dark waters, on the darks shadows lay vague against its i armissed radiance.

But in the advent of that shadowed moon lay the only change. The caim held undisturbed.

Cadogan passed a hand across his forefread. "You-er-called me, Terry?" he said, indistinctly.

Creagh's surprise was too genaine to be questioned.

"No sir. Be like you dreamed it."

"I-presume so. You yourself haven't been asleep, Terry?"

"Devil a wink-respects to you, Misther Pether."

"I thought perhaps you might have sworn some one called for help."

"I hope you're mistaken, sir. It's myself that's been starin' wide awake the night and never a sound have I heard, beyond that complainin' klock, which I will be greasin', come the mounin'."

"Oh! I must have dreamed it.

What's that?"

Again that cry. faint, far fainter than it had seemed at the moment of his

FINANCIAL

Again he shouted, again walted in breathless anxiety for the response that never came.

At length, "There's something more than strange in this!" he decided. "Haul in our dory, Terry. I'll have a look at that boat."

"Ah! Misther Pether, now, you would not be doin' anythin' as rash as that?" pieaded Creagh in panie. "Faith, it's temptin' Providence."

"Be quiet!" snapped Cadogan. In default of Creagh's prompt obedienle, he himself seized the painter and with a vigorous jerk yanked the small boat in under the taffrail. Then thrust the rope into Creag 's reductant fingers. "Hold that till I get in!" Cadogan dropped into the dory as he spoke.

"Cast off!" he commanded, sharply, reating himself upon the middle thwart and fitting oars in locks. "D've hear me. Terry?"

"I hear, I hear, sir, but..." With mighty effort the Irishman mas-

She gripped Cadogan's ready fingers with a gras, whose cruelty she did not guess, and stood up.

"Well, it's ever now." Cadogan soothed her as he helped her into the Colleen's boat. "It's all right now, and you mustn't think about your sufferings any longer."

"No, indeed, ma'am," Creagh put in. "Just sit you down and think how lucky it was that the skipper heard your hail."
